Literary Analysis: "A Family Supper"

In "A Family Supper", Author Kazuo Ishiguro uses different emotions like anger, sadness, and disappointment as well as symbolism to show the feelings of the narrator and his father as he returns to Japan after 17 years away following the death of his mother.

The author starts out the story by explaining how the narrators mother passed away from eating a fish called Fugu and how he did not find out about the incident until two years later when he returned to Tokyo.

"The fish has held a special significance for me ever since my mother died through eating one." The narrator feels that the Fugu fish symbolizes his mother in a way. He goes on to explain that if the fish isn't prepared properly, the poison resides in its veins and can be extremely painful and fatal to whoever eats it. "Apparently, my mother had always refused to eat fugu, but on this particular occasion she had made an exception, having been invited by an old schoolfriend whom she was anxious not to offend." Although not necessarily implied, there could be possible feelings of resentment towards the mother's friend from the narrator seeing as though, if it wasn't for them, his mother would never have eaten the fish. These feelings of resentment can very well be a factor of the grief he is feeling after learning of his mother's passing two years after it happened.

Ishiguro goes on to show readers a peak of the relationship the narrator had with his parents, more specifically his father, and why the reader most likely went on to move to California and cut all contact for 17 years. "His general presence was not one which encouraged relaxed conversation..." When describing his father, the narrator resonated an uncomfortable feeling and seems to imply the misogynistic persona his father carries with him. This can be assumed when the narrator finds a resemblance between his father and Chou En-lai however refrains from saying it out loud because his father would seemingly be offended because he is proud of his pure samurai bloodline. "...a boyhood memory came back to me of the time he had struck me several times around the head for 'chattering like an old woman'." Here the author shows how the relationship
