

Brand New Ancients Answer Key

Brand New Ancients

by Kate Tempest

In the old days
the myths were the stories we used to explain ourselves.
But how can we explain the way we hate ourselves, the things we've made ourselves into,
the way we break ourselves in two,
the way we overcomplicate ourselves?

But we are still mythical.
We are still permanently trapped somewhere between the heroic and the pitiful.
We are still godly;
that's what makes us so monstrous.
But it feels like we've forgotten we're much more than the sum of all the things that belong to us.

The empty skies rise over the benches where the old men sit - they are desolate
and friendless
and the young men spit; inside they're delicate, but outside they're reckless and I reckon that these are our heroes, these are our legends.
That face on the street you walk past without looking at, or that face on the street that walks past you without looking back or the man in the supermarket trying to keep his kids out of his trolley, or the woman by the postbox fighting with her broly, every single person has a purpose in them burning.
Look again, and allow yourself to see them.

Millions of characters, each with their own epic narratives singing it's hard to be an angel until you've been a demon.

The sky is so perfect it looks like a painting but the air is so thick that we feel like we're fainting.
Still the myths in this city have always said the same thing - about how all we need is a place to belong; how all we need is to know what's right from what's wrong and how we all need is to struggle to find out for ourselves which side we are on.
