Name: _____ Date: _____

GOBBLE GOBBLE ZZZZZzzz

For years now, many people have claimed that after eating your Thanksgiving meal, the sleepy feeling that overcomes you isn't just in your head.

Turkey contains an amino acid called tryptophan, which can be used to promote sleep. Amino acids are the building blocks of proteins and are required for life. Tryptophan is an "essential" amino acid because the body cannot make it. Instead, you have to eat foods that contain tryptophan to get enough. You can also find tryptophan in oats, bananas, milk, eggs, peanuts and sunflower seeds. It is almost sure to be found in all common livestock and poultry.

Besides making thousands of proteins, the body uses tryptophan to make serotonin, a key brain transmitter. Serotonin plays a role in the regulation of mood. Tryptophan's sedative effects could be related to its role in the synthesis of serotonin. Tryptophan is also necessary for making a form of vitamin B called niacin, which is important for the function of skin, nerves and the digestive tract.

What is tryptophan? _____

Why is tryptophan "essential"? _____

Which foods contain tryptophan? _____

What is one theory as to why you get so tired after eating your Thanksgiving meal? _____

Name two things that the body uses tryptophan for. _____

What is one possible explanation as to why tryptophan makes you sleepy? _____

Tryptophan supplements can be taken for insomnia (trouble sleeping). These supplements usually come in doses that range from 500 milligrams to 3,000 milligrams daily. However, a 3 ounce serving of turkey contains about 200 mg of tryptophan — about the same as chicken or beef contains and significantly less than peanuts or cheddar cheese contain.

Additionally, the synthesis of serotonin is strictly regulated by your body, so ingesting extra tryptophan will probably not cause increased serotonin levels in the brain (recall that the sleepiness tryptophan may cause might linked to serotonin synthesis).
