Rhetorical Analysis Of Ronald Reagan's Challenger Speech

The following rhetorical analysis essay examines Ronald Reagan's Challenger speech, one of the most significant speeches in American history. The 1986 Challenger disaster was a tragic event that affected many people across the country. On that fateful day, the space shuttle Challenger exploded, killing all seven crew members on board. Among them was Christa McAuliffe, a teacher who was set to be the first civilian in space. The disaster shook the nation to its core, and President Ronald Reagan delivered a speech to help comfort the American people. His speech was a powerful example of rhetorical strategy, using language to both console the nation and inspire them to continue their pursuit of space exploration.

Everyone in America watched as the 25th shuttle mission took off with what seemed to be no issue, and they listened to the commentary. It seemed to be a perfectly normal mission. Then, after only one minute and 12 seconds, the space shuttle exploded into a puff of smoke. All that was left to everyone watching were two rocket boosters smoking from a giant cloud that had been the Challenger. This whole ordeal was seen by everyone in America and created a crisis that needed to be addressed by the president. At the time Ronald Reagan was the president and weirdly enough the day of the Challenger disaster was the same day the State of the Union was supposed to be delivered. Instead of having the state of the union, Ronald Reagan addressed the crisis at hand, which was created by the tragic space shuttle crash. The "Challenger" Tragedy Address was an attempt to help a Nation come back from a terrible tragedy. The seven men and women were applauded and kept hope up in the American people. This was shown in the claims of Reagan: that the Challenger men and women were wonderful people and deserve to be remembered, that we will forge on, and that the space program will not end with this disaster. This is shown through Ronald Reagan's delivery, use of diction, and appeals to pathos. The main goal of the address was to help America begin to recover from the loss of the men and women on the shuttle and the loss of the challenger, to eulogize the seven men and women killed in the crash, and to keep the hope up in the American people. Reagan begins his speech by saying "Today is a day for mourning and remembering... we are pained to the core by the tragedy." At other points in the speech, he talks about the "national loss." By addressing it, and saying that he, himself, is hurt by it, he allows America to know just how much this impacted his life. A little farther into his address, he takes time to talk about the schoolchildren who had watched the disaster, live. To explain to them that "it's hard to understand, but sometimes painful things happen." The explanation is a lot like how a parent would explain to a child about the loss. He ends this part of the address by saying, "The Challenger crew was pulling us into the future, and we'll continue to follow them." He addresses the other men and women of NASA, and tells them he wishes he "could talk to every man and woman who works for NASA, or who works on this mission, and tell them... 'We know of your anguish. We share it.'" By reiterating how much this crash impacted everyone, himself, most importantly those too young to understand it, and to the people who personally connected to it or to the people on the shuttle. Reagan shows the people of America, that this affected everyone, even him. He then personally brings his wife Nancy into his speech, he says they are "pained to the core." This personal connection further demonstrates the impact on himself and his family. When Reagan talks about the magnitude of the crisis, and how many people were
