"Zel," he whispered excitedly. "Our harp was imbued with the magic of the goddesses."

"Exactly. That's why this won't work."

"No. It'll work with this one too, Your Grace." Zelda's eyes shone with understanding.

"I am Hylia!" she exclaimed. She glanced back at Maddy nervously after the outburst, but thankfully she'd gone back to her phone. "I don't have all the power I once did, but if I played the song on this harp and sang the right words to it, it might just do it. The harp will be worth way more than $200, but unless they try to play and sing the right tune and verse, nothing will happen. It's worth a try." Link passed her the harp, and she positioned her fingers for the first chord.

As she began to strum, the brass glowed slightly. When she started to sing, it continued to shine till the gold was almost too bright to look at. It faded back to its original state, but it was quickly evident that Hylia had done her work.

Zelda played and sang verse after verse, and soon a white light started to shine around her. Before long it was so bright even Maddy looked up at them. The magic took hold of them again and the harp dropped from Zelda's fingers as though it has passed right through them.

They were back home. Everything was exactly as they had left it, as if they hadn't been gone at all. Link and Zelda both turned in full 360° circles trying to make sure that everything was right. They stared at each other with blank expressions, and then, abruptly and simultaneously, they caught each other up in the other's arms.

"I'm so glad we're home," Zelda said. "This is the right thing to do, Link. I'd started to worry that trying to live on the Surface wasn't such a good idea."

"I know. Me too. I was ready to quit. But if what we saw was the future, then we'd better work hard to make that really be the real future."

"Yeah." They put each other down. "Maybe that's why the goddesses put that song in your head. Maybe they wanted us to see that."

"Maybe. We'll never really know," said Link.

"Yeah." Zelda's face suddenly went as white as a sheet. "Oh no," she breathed.

"Wha-"

"My fish!" She ran into the kitchen, shouting as she ran. "Don't you smell them burning?" As Zelda pulled her charred remains of salmon out of the fire Link stood in the living room, laughing.
