Ancient Civilizations

Egypt

In ancient Egypt, women's fashion was characterized by simplicity and elegance. The primary garment was the kalasiris, a sheath dress that was made from linen, a fabric suited for the hot climate. Women adorned themselves with jewelry made from gold and semi-precious stones, emphasizing their status and beauty.

- Simple, straight-cut designs
- Intricate jewelry as a status symbol

Greece and Rome

silhouette. In contrast, Roman women wore the stola, which was a long dress that indicated respectability and marital status.

- Key Features:
- Greek chitons emphasized draping and natural lines
- Roman stolas showcased social status
- Both cultures valued modesty and grace in women's attire

The Middle Ages

During the Middle Ages, women's fashion began to reflect the feudal system and the varying degrees of wealth. The clothing became more complex, with layered garments and distinctive styles based on social class.

Fashion Elements

- Under Gowns: Women wore long under gowns known as chemises beneath their outer garments.
- Outer Garments: The common outer garment was the surcote, which was often adorned with embroidery.
- Headgear: Headdresses became popular, ranging from simple veils to elaborate structures like the steeple headdress.

As the period progressed, the introduction of the corset in the late Middle Ages began to shape women's figures, emphasizing an hourglass silhouette.

The Renaissance

- Elaborate Gowns: Women wore gowns with wide sleeves and deep necklines, often layered with petticoats for added volume.
- Accessories: Accessories such as gloves, jewelry, and elaborate hairstyles became essential components of women's fashion.

The concept of beauty began to evolve, with women idealizing a pale complexion, leading to the use of lead-based powders, which unfortunately had toxic effects.

The 18th Century and the Enlightenment

The 18th century saw the emergence of the Rococo style, which emphasized femininity and grace. Women's fashion featured flowing gowns and intricate decorations.
